Millions of children are sick and dying. By one estimate, 3.5 billion children are stunted, meaning that they are growing at less than normal rates. The World Health Organization has declared malnutrition a global epidemic. Scientists like to think of human fertility as a series of trade-offs—more body mass provides more calories and helps babies survive, but fewer calories means fewer calories for adults, and fewer calories means fewer calories for babies. For Mother Nature, then, there must be a point when mothers no longer seek to maximize their infant's survival: they start thinking instead about the survival of their children. By any measure, survival rates have been going down. Worldwide, the annual death rate for children under 5 years old dropped from 41.7 per 1,000 in 1950 to 15.3 in 2015. And it's getting worse: in 1998, the death rate fell by 19.5 percent; from 2000 to 2015, it fell by 17.3 percent. Put another way, a million children are dying each day, every day. The causes are many, but they include malnutrition, infectious diseases, and poverty. Many experts think that the western diet—rich in calories but low in nutrients—is killing children. Though data are limited, a few studies have shown that dietary deficiencies associated with grains, dairy, refined sugars, vegetable oils, and processed meats may be harming children's health. In April 2014, the United States Public Health Service issued a public statement saying that "an estimated 538,000 deaths occur among children under 5 years of age annually." The statement also noted that "children who are malnourished and stunted" are likely to die young from heart disease, kidney failure, and diabetes. It acknowledged that the "prevalence of stunting among children worldwide has declined, but the deaths and disease burden in children are still serious." We need to think differently about malnutrition—not just for the sake of our children, but for ourselves. There are several reasons why this malnutrition is going on, but the primary reason is that we as a society have decided to give health the lowest priority. Here are five key facts about malnutrition: • One billion people are malnourished and growing. Half of them are children. • Malnutrition affects the cognitive ability of the world's children. Those who are malnourished in utero or as young

Prevalence of blood transfusion services in developing countries. The lack of an appropriate blood supply in developing countries and the perceived insufficient need for blood transfusion services is related to the low utilization of services. There are many factors inhibiting development of blood transfusion services, including long distances from hospital to transfusion laboratory and from hospital to clinic, a lack of donors, a lack of staff trained to perform transfusion services, the high cost of providing transfusion services, lack of provision of appropriate facilities for storage of blood units, and the high cost of blood. We have conducted a survey of the blood transfusion services in 19 countries in Africa, Asia, and Latin America to assess the scope of the problem, the current level of utilization of services, the current status of services in these countries, and the future challenges. The survey included determining the number of hospital beds, the volume of blood transfused, the number of facilities, the cost of blood, the need for blood, and the amount and cost of blood. The questionnaire was completed by a representative of the Ministry of Health, a hospital, a university, or other institution in each country. Responses were obtained from nine countries (42%) in Africa, nine countries (42%) in Asia, and two countries (10%) in Latin America. The results of the survey indicated that three-quarters of the responding countries have hospitals with established blood transfusion services, and that most (56%) estimate that the volume of blood needed annually is in excess of the national average. The total number of blood units transfused per year is an average of 9000 per year, and the average volume of blood units transfused per hospital is 900 units per year. The approximate costs of blood collection, transport, and storage are $60 per unit. Almost all of the blood is collected from volunteer donors. The cost of blood transfusion services is 50% of the direct cost of hospital care. The survey suggests that, although many hospitals in these developing countries have blood transfusion services, they are not used as much as they could be. In many of the countries, the government is a major provider of blood transfusion services; a national blood transfusion service is not available in any of the countries surveyed. The low volume of blood transfused and the high cost of blood, together with the large distances to hospitals and clinics and the poor infrastructural conditions in these countries, are the most important factors inhibiting the development of transfusion services. There is a need for a nationally coordinated approach to
