The present invention relates to data networks, and more specifically, to evaluating and selecting a provider for use in a network. The Internet is a world-wide computer network that is accessible to millions of people. The Internet has changed the way we receive, deliver, and store information and has also changed the way businesses conduct their affairs. The World Wide Web or simply "Web" is an Internet service that many businesses use to display information and sell products and services. There are also many other types of Internet-based services. The service is free because it is based on the Hypertext Transfer Protocol (HTTP). The data is delivered using Hypertext Transfer Protocol over Secure Socket Layer (HTTPS), using Public Key Infrastructure (PKI). A web server communicates with a user using a web browser which loads a Hypertext Markup Language (HTML) file. The server may be responsible for storing the HTML and associated data, such as images, videos, and other multimedia, in web pages. A web server needs a Domain Name System (DNS) to connect to the Internet. A DNS is a global directory that associates domain names with IP addresses. A DNS server has a list of domain names, usually the top-level domains (TLDs) for example: .com, .org, .net, .edu and .gov. The number of assigned TLDs is increasing. The number of TLDs that end in ".info" is about to double, and an ".uk" TLD will soon be released. The increasing number of TLDs in use is causing more and more of the problems associated with running a domain name system, such as running out of IP addresses. With the advent of new services such as FTP, standard Internet users who may not have an e-mail address at present can access the Internet in the same way, via the web, by installing a web server that has a static IP address. The static IP address is used for receiving web page requests. This avoids having to use dynamic DNS services, which are needed to update the IP address used by the web server. The web server is often connected to a load balancer/router, where incoming web server requests are distributed among multiple web servers by the

The San Antonio Spurs were flying high at the end of the 2011-12 season, second place in the Western Conference with a 41-11 record. They were off to a great start in the playoffs against a relatively unknown Blazers team until they dropped Game 5, 66-58. Even though I was emotionally devastated over the loss, I had a new admiration for the Blazers. Previously I saw them as an ambitious team with a lot of potential, now I saw them as a scrappy team with a great coach. So far as off the court has improved with the hiring of Terry Stotts as coach, the team is still the same scrappy group of players that has been in San Antonio the last twenty-plus years. Tonight's win shows that with a great coaching staff you don't have to have a lot of money, or be part of a big market to be successful, but you also don't have to be a loser to do that either. Here are some stats that tell the story of this game. Portland State would shoot 15 shots from the field and make all of them in the first quarter. They would make 12 of their 15 shots from the field in the first quarter, as a result the Spurs had only two shot attempts from the field in the quarter. Portland State would stay at this pace into the second quarter, but the Spurs would take control and hold on to the lead for the rest of the game. Portland State would make only two of their 15 shots from the field in the first half, while the Spurs shot 10-15 and made 9-10. In the second half, the Blazers made only five shots from the field and the Spurs took control and won the game. Portland State's defense is OK, but nothing like what you'd expect from a team with Ken Catanella as their Defensive Coordinator. Portland State allowed
