A team of US scientists in Wisconsin is developing a device that detects early signs of Parkinson's disease by probing the fluid at the back of the mouth. If the findings are replicated, a device that can be used in the home or in the car could be a first step towards widespread screening of patients, and potentially prevent people from developing the debilitating disease. The team of scientists at the University of Wisconsin-Madison was led by Professor Paul Wandell, one of the world's leading experts in the fluid in the mouth, and included graduate students David Swanson and Sarah Hallett. "Our initial observations suggest that swallowing-related disturbances correlate with early Parkinson's disease and Alzheimer's disease," said Professor Wandell, who holds the Byron and Marjorie Davis Endowed Chair of Biochemistry at the university. "In the future, we intend to test a small portable device that could potentially detect these disturbances in the fluids of the mouth. "We are not recommending or suggesting that we would want to diagnose Parkinson's disease or Alzheimer's disease using this approach, but we are suggesting that we may be able to detect the presence of these diseases using our technology as a screening tool." The team used liquid sensors known as micro-electrodes to investigate the relationship between the levels of fluid in the mouth and the
