Safety Food and drink products are big business. To meet the needs of consumer and regulation expectations, global players have been investing in innovation and distribution channels, as well as in the brand, and design communities to ensure they remain competitive. These companies have also been increasingly focused on the customer's experience, and have been moving away from the product — by simplifying the packaging, adding more fun or novelty, or focusing on the experience. As consumers' needs have evolved, so have the expectations around health, safety, and sustainability. If businesses want to meet these consumer expectations, they need to also be perceived as delivering better outcomes in terms of customer experience. How brands are getting smarter to meet these expectations, and the challenges presented by the evolving 'consumer of life' As the classic question of consumer knowledge, expectations and demands changes, it is imperative to take a more holistic, comprehensive approach to building a brand which meets the evolving expectations. Brand and product design communities have a unique opportunity to help out brands that want to meet these expectations. The successful innovators and design professionals of the future will be those who understand the needs of the changing customer and are able to reposition brand and product concepts to meet the needs of that customer. The era of the customer as brand ambassador has left a significant mark on the consumer. For years now, consumers have been expected to act as brand ambassadors, and brands as innovators and communicators, in order to meet these demands. 5ec8ef588b
