Select a version for download..Spatial relationships between biomechanical properties and ankle plantarflexion moment: a musculoskeletal modeling study. This study aimed to determine the effects of musculoskeletal (MSK) modeling assumptions on the kinematic and static and dynamic mechanical properties of the lower extremity during simulated walking and to identify the influence of the ankle plantarflexion (PF) moment on these properties. It was hypothesized that certain MSK assumptions yield results that are not biologically reasonable. A musculoskeletal (MSK) model of a healthy individual (a female, 68.5 years old, 1.6 m, 82.8 kg) was used to determine the average lower extremity joint moments and lower extremity joint coordinate system orientations in dorsiflexion and plantarflexion during a gait cycle. The ankle was represented as a three-degree-of-freedom (DOF) joint, and muscle moments and muscle lengths were modeled as constant. Joint angles and moments were determined using inverse kinematics and inverse dynamics. Kinematic and static and dynamic joint properties were calculated from the joint angle-moment data for five variations of the MSK model. The following five variations of the MSK model were tested: (1) the ankle was fixed at the same position during walking (fixed ankle); (2) the ankle was fixed at the initial positions of walking (fixed initial position); (3) muscle-tendon units (MTUs) were modeled as passive (ie, freely or nonlinearly coupled); (4) the magnitude of the MTU force-length relationship was increased (in the positive direction of ankle dorsiflexion) or decreased (in the negative direction of ankle dorsiflexion); (5) the initial position of the lower leg was changed. For the MSK model in which the ankle was considered to be freely
